Aston Martin has big plans for the future. It aims to launch three models before the end of the decade, including a new sports car and an all-electric crossover. There are also plans for a new powerboat, which Aston will be building with Dutch company Quintessence Yacht. It will be the first of a full line of powerboats and yachts.

The boat will be called the AM37 as a nod to its 37-foot length. The hull will be made of lightweight composites with carbon fiber for structural parts to keep the overall weight down. The AM37 will be the luxury car of the sea with handling, performance, and amenities like what you'd find in an Aston Martin on wheels.

The interior will feature a high-definition touch screen that can be worked with buttons, remote control, or voice commands. There will be two captains chairs and a wrap-around bench set to accommodate 8 of your friends to take along for the journey.

According to Digital Trends, the Aston Martin powerboat is still in the early stages of development. A first prototype is under construction in England so there aren't even official pictures, just these computer-generated images of what they hope to build. The real thing will be unveiled at a private event held later this year.
