

Aston Martin Speedboat Coming With New Partnership With Quintessence Yachts

Anthony Alaniz · May 4, 2015 · Aston Martin

While we already know Aston Martin has found the funds to pursue building a crossover based on its DBX concept, it looks like the British automaker is expanding its lineup even further with a speedboat — because that market is booming right now.

The boat, the AM37, will be built in partnership with Dutch boat builder Quintessence Yachts, and the naval architects at Mulder Design. The AM37 will be available in two distinguished versions and include a high-tech composite structure, interactive voice control, an HD-integrated touch screen with navigation and multimedia, and remote control functions.

What those versions, functions and remote controls control are still a mystery right now. The composite structure is said to give the yacht sports car-like control. We don't know how we'd test that, but until the polar ice caps melt thanks to global warming and floods the Nürburgring, we have no way to compare it to the LaFerrari or Nissan GT-R.

The press release says details about the speedboat will be revealed in due time, but those passionate about owning it will likely receive details first on a one-on-one basis. Now that is some luxury exclusivity.
